Putting Public Health to Work for Tri-Town

Public Health Excellence (PHE) funds made it possible for the Tri-Town Public Health team to bring health education and resources directly to residents through community events, free trainings, and a new speaker series. Two new staff members joined the team this year, expanding its capacity to meet the community where it is and respond to what residents actually need.

Learning Series That Brought Community Together

For residents looking to connect with health and wellness resources, the Tri-Town region delivered. The region held its first annual Health and Wellness Fair, welcoming more than 30 vendors from across the health and wellness field, and piloted a Lunch and Learn Series where local community members spoke on a range of public health topics, creating new opportunities for residents to learn from their neighbors.

Raising the Bar on Inspections

Keeping restaurants, homes, and public spaces safe takes training, expertise, and dedication. Inspector Connor Galvin earned his Registered Environmental Health Specialist certification and completed specialized training across food safety, housing, and environmental health, bringing a higher level of knowledge and skill to every inspection he conducts across the Tri-Town region.

"I want to make sure we have healthy and safe environments in our communities."

Connor Galvin, Essex County Tri-Town Shared Health Initiative Inspector
